The phrase "procrastination is the thief of time" suggests that procrastination is a destructive habit that robs us of the valuable time we have and that is why we need to collar that thief.

I think that to collar this thief we must actively resist the urge to delay or defer our desired actions, avoid distractions and fight against the habit of time-wasting. We must also be wary of procrastination's disguises, such as delaying due to hesitation or avoiding unpleasant tasks, because only by taking proactive measures to manage our time and remain disciplined in our actions can we keep procrastination at bay and make the most of the time we have. To conquer procrastination once and for all we must also face our fears of failure, break down large tasks into smaller more manageable goals and find the motivation to focus on what we want to achieve.

We may also need to identify the root that causes our procrastination. My friend once did it — when she broke up with her boyfriend she was feeling overwhelmed and tired ^{by emotions} by everything that had happened to her and couldn't concentrate on her studies and her life. But once she found that root and organically lived her emotions she was able to get back on the line.

In the conclusion, procrastination is a sneaky thief that can steal our time and prevent ~~our time~~ ^{us from} fulfilling our potential. But by staying focused ~~and disciplined~~ we can take control of our time and use it to our advantage. ~~instead of letting it slip away.~~
